

Punctually Unpredictable FENDI.COM/TIMEPIECES

HOME TOUR Pitch Perfect: Andrew Bird and Katherine Tsina at Home

For this creative couple, a one-of-a-kind hideaway in Los Angeles provides the ultimate retreat for inspired living

Written by Melissa Goldstein Photographed by Coral von Zumwalt Produced by Sarah Storms

Pin it Tweet it Comment it Share it

Andrew Bird, Katherine Tsina, and their son, Sam, in their Los Angeles residence. Prop styling by Britt Browne.

When you have a design sense, it's almost easier if your house starts out not right... It helps to look at a space and think, 'We can begin again.'... Sitting on a Milo Baughman sofa under the soaring hardwood ceiling of the great room in her 1920s-era residence, it's hard to believe that anything was ever off about the place.

But when Tsina, a classically trained dancer turned fashion designer, and her husband, singer-songwriter Andrew Bird, first set eyes on their home a year and a half ago during an impromptu house-hunting weekend in Los Angeles, they were struck by the need to lighten things up.

The couple had moved west from New York City with their now almost-four-year-old son, Sam, in pursuit of the golden work-life ratio. 'I'd come to L.A. to finish records, and I'd see producers or musicians who had a converted garage as a studio and could work normal hours and have dinner with the family. That seemed pretty ideal,' says Bird. He and Tsina, who designs a womenwear line called Avion, had met through a mutual friend in 2009 and married the year after.

DanishDesignStore

The fashion designer in her home studio.

Tsina, a classically trained dancer, was previously a fit model.

I THINK YOU NEED A CLEAN SPACE IF YOU'RE TRYING TO MAKE SOMETHING NEW IN IT.

KATHERINE TSINA

The age-old craft of indigo dyeing looks right at home with midcentury and contemporary pieces in Tsina's studio.

Their West Village apartment served as a test site for navigating a complementary decor aesthetic between Tsina's "desert-luxe-Pasadenan" inclinations (Bird's tongue-in-cheek assessment of his wife's sensibility) and his weakness for industrial pieces. 'I'm more particular than I think I am,' he admits. 'For a whole swath of my twenties I had this idea that [design was] materialistic and I didn't care about those things... but that kinda came back around.' The two pride themselves on having successfully honed their look. 'We've had to find our taste together,' says Tsina. 'We've both always liked a lot of midcentury furniture, but it was about balancing it with more rustic vintage pieces.'

Having decided they'd be putting down roots in California, the couple took their time laying the stylistic foundation of their home, seeking to highlight its innate character—from the Mediterranean archways to the early 20th-century moldings. They began by gutting the kitchen, painting the walls a fresh white (painting by Farrow & Ball), and curating finishing details: Moroccan tile in the bathrooms and minimal graphite- and brass fixtures from Waterworks and Liz's Antique Hardware.

The dining room became Tsina's studio, which called for a clear delineation of spaces. The pair commissioned Culver City woodworker Mike Fair to build a dining barn door with an ebonized wash to complement the adjoining great room's ceiling. A drafting table, an elemental multiarm chandelier from Brooklyn-based Workstead, and an indigo textile from Cameroon add interest to the pared-back environs. 'I think you need a clean space if you're trying to make something new in it,' Tsina explains. A rack of her latest designs—including a stunning backless floor-length silk-crepe gown and an embossed-silk cocktail dress with a network of ribbon closures—stands nearby, in a elegant case in a point.

Statement pieces are selected with the same thoughtfulness as in potential roommate. In the kitchen, a long John Derian field sofa in indigo denim was the result of a months-long search for the ultimate hard-wearing yet inviting lounge. The biomorphic wood coffee table in the front window is no ordinary tea-time resting spot—it was crafted by sculptor Alma Allen.

The dining room became Tsina's studio, which called for a clear delineation of spaces. The pair commissioned Culver City woodworker Mike Fair to build a dining barn door with an ebonized wash to complement the adjoining great room's ceiling. A drafting table, an elemental multiarm chandelier from Brooklyn-based Workstead, and an indigo textile from Cameroon add interest to the pared-back environs. 'I think you need a clean space if you're trying to make something new in it,' Tsina explains. A rack of her latest designs—including a stunning backless floor-length silk-crepe gown and an embossed-silk cocktail dress with a network of ribbon closures—stands nearby, in a elegant case in a point.

Statement pieces are selected with the same thoughtfulness as in potential roommate. In the kitchen, a long John Derian field sofa in indigo denim was the result of a months-long search for the ultimate hard-wearing yet inviting lounge. The biomorphic wood coffee table in the front window is no ordinary tea-time resting spot—it was crafted by sculptor Alma Allen.

Art is equally considered. 'It's got to be personal,' says Bird. 'Don't put a piece up unless it means something to you.' The resulting collection includes a series of black-and-white still-life studies of napkins by close friend Addie Jaull, and a painted copperplate figurative etching by Bird's mom, which hangs in the upstairs guest room. A dapperly romantic etching by Audrey Niffenegger—an artist turned best-selling author who also taught art to Bird's mother—is installed in the stairwell. The piece, which previously resided on his parents' Illinois farm, was gifted to them after only a light bit of prompting. 'We were there one summer, and I was like, 'You know where that would look so nice?'' the soft-spoken Tsina confesses.

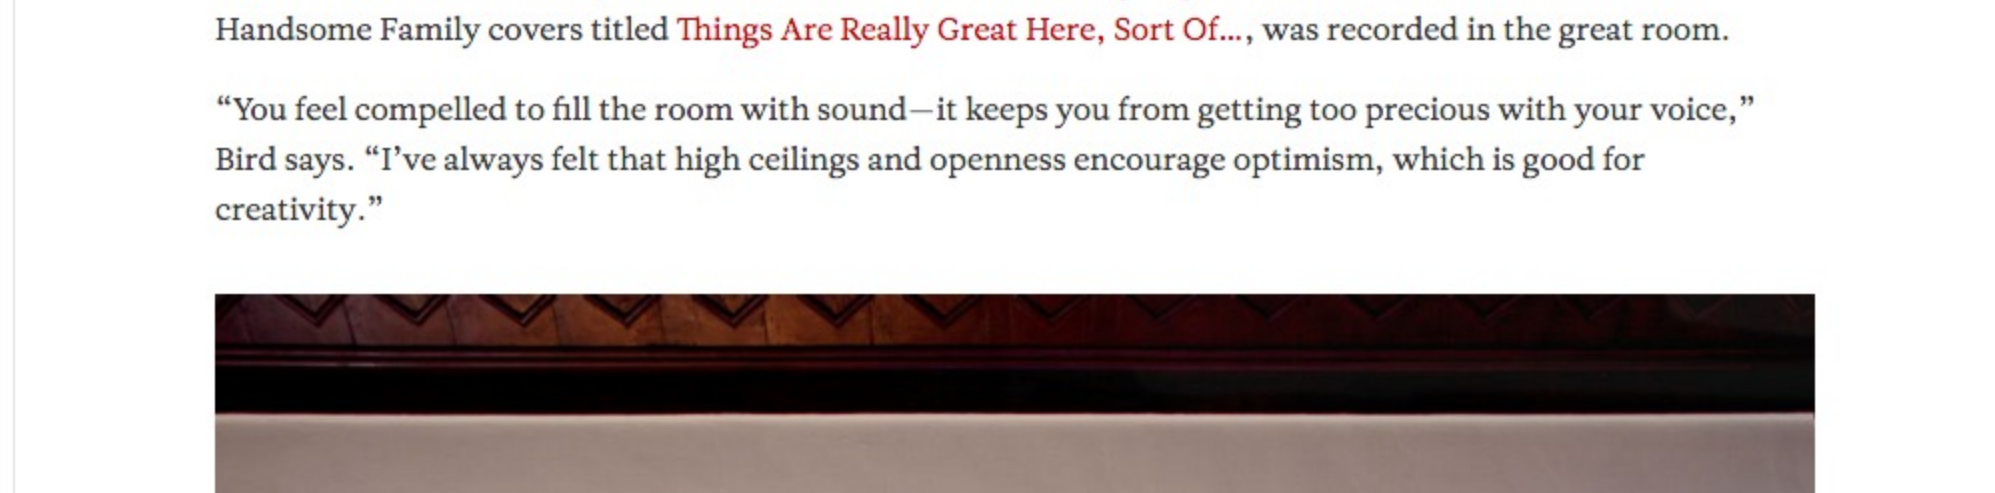

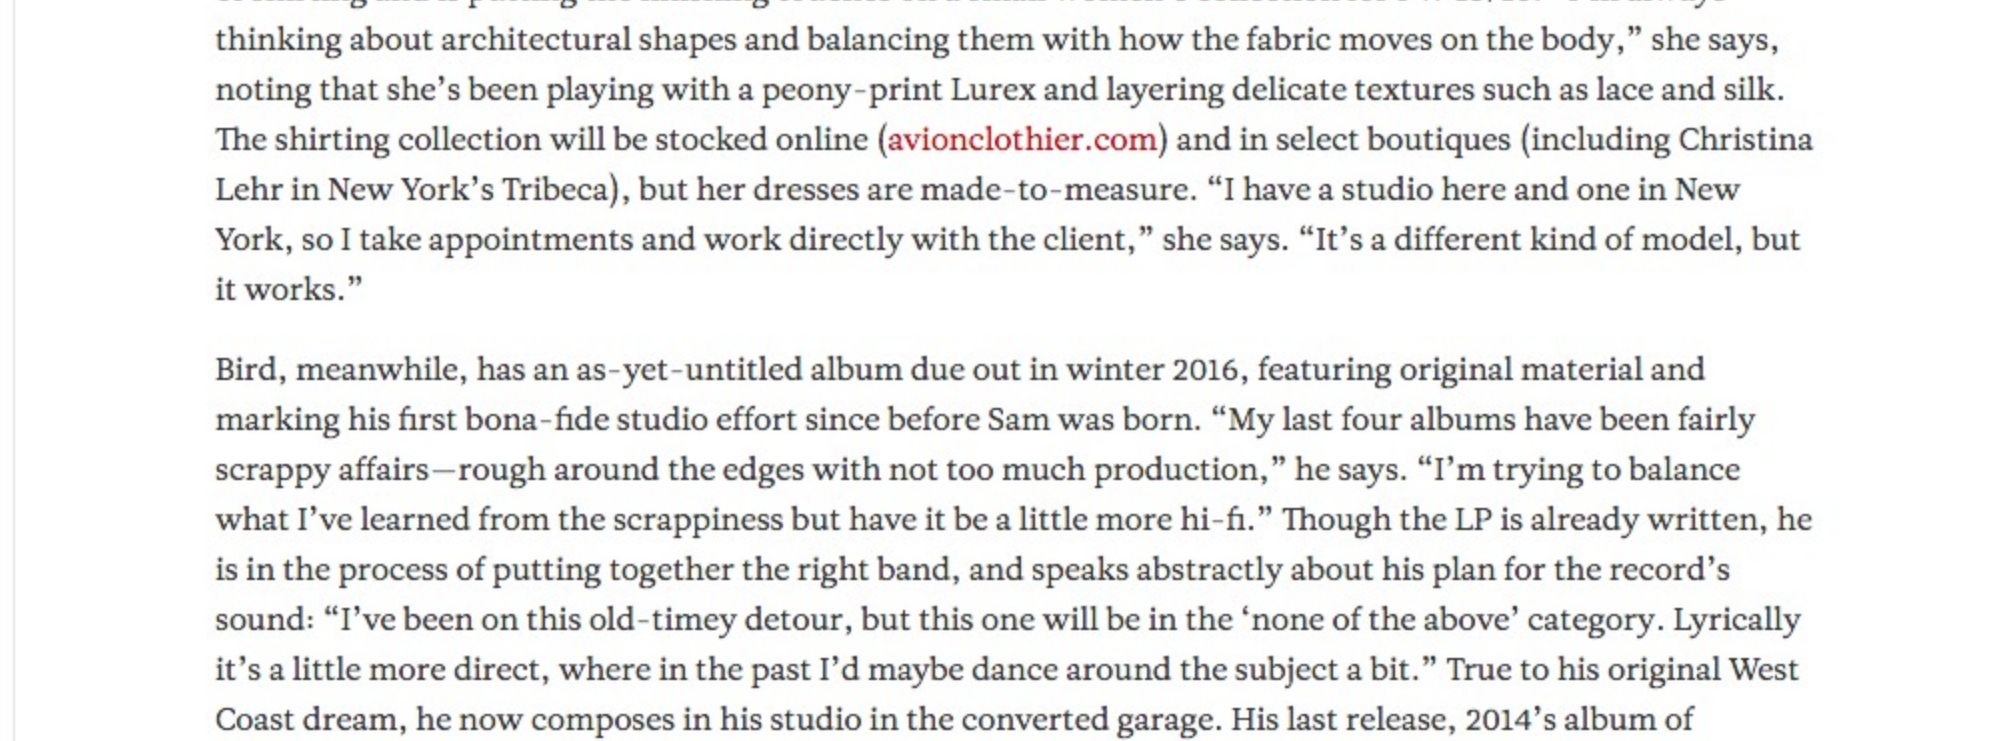

[ART HAS] GOT TO BE PERSONAL. DON'T PUT A PIECE UP UNLESS IT MEANS SOMETHING TO YOU.

—ANDREW BIRD

The couple's professional endeavors have flourished in their new home. Tsina recently launched a unisex line of shirting and is putting the finishing touches on a small women's collection for FW 15/16. 'I'm always thinking about architectural shapes and balancing them with how the fabric moves on the body,' she says, noting that she's been playing with a peony-print Lurex and layering delicate textures such as lace and silk. The shirting collection will be stocked online (avionclothing.com) and in select boutiques (including Christina Lehr in New York's Tribeca, and her dresses are made-to-measure. 'I have a studio here and one in New York, so I take appointments and work directly with the client,' she says. 'It's a different kind of model, but it works.'

Bird, meanwhile, has an as-yet-untitled album due out in winter 2016, featuring original material and marking his first bona-fide studio effort since before Sam was born. 'My last four albums have been fairly scrappy affairs—rough around the edges with not too much production,' he says. 'I'm trying to balance what I've learned from the scrappiness but have it be a little more hi-fi.' Though the LP is already written, he is in the process of putting together the right band, and speaks abstractly about his plan for the record's sound: 'I've been on this odd-timey detour, but this one will be in the 'none of the above' category. Lyrically it's a little more direct, where in the past I'd maybe dance around the subject a bit.' True to his original West Coast dream, he now composes in his studio in the converted garage. His last release, 2014's album of Handsome Family covers titled Things Are Really Great Here, Sort Of... was recorded in the great room.

'You feel compelled to fill the room with sound—it keeps you from getting too precious with your voice,' Bird says. 'I've always felt that high ceilings and openness encourage openness, which is good for creativity.'

A light touch with the finishes brings grace and modernity to the home's 1920s architecture.

Share on Facebook Tweet this

Comments

4 Comments Sort by Oldest

DeeDee Colvin Quite boring

Elizabeth Canfield Kieessling Amen!!

Qim Tmim Clean and inspiring.

Ana Cristina glad to see this straight prideful couple being together. No matter if their style is boring, I find it simple but if they like it like that, let them be. Blessings to this family.

Facebook Comments Plugin

more from Lonny

Step Inside Kesh's Surprisingly Spacious Nashville Home

The Find: A Private Island Hideout in the Philippines

Jason Biggs Makes Over His Home With Help From Wayfair

Make Yourself at Home in Kate Spade New York's New Pop-Up

more from ZimBio

Who Would Take a Bullet for You?

Disney, Viacom Will No Longer Film in Georgia If Anti-Gay...

Brie Larson Says 'Room' Bonded Her to 9-Year-Old Co-Star...

'90s Nickelodeon Program 'The Splat' Is Getting an All...

more from StyleBistro

Look of the Day: Amy Adams' Blue Beauty

The Best Dressed Petite Stars

Classic Style Inspiration

Happy Birthday Pics! See Her 40 Best Instagram Pics!

more from Livingly

5 Stupid Simple Mac and Cheese Recipes

All the Accessories You Need to Get Through Festival...

These Falling Model GIFs Are All of Us

The Best Freebies You Can Score On Your Birthday

Home Terms & Policies Advertise About Us

Livingly ZIMBIO STYLEBISTRO Lonny Livingly

Copyright © 2016 - Livingly Media, Inc. Livingly Style